ENGINEERS IN THE THE ROYAL

Those who know much of the inner life on poord thins of the Royal Navy, are very well aware that engineers in that service have but a sorry time of it. They are almost invariably regarded by the sailing officers of Her Majesty's ironclads, and other vessels, as belonging to an inferior caste, and are well nigh made to think themselves so, by force of the homiliations to which they are constantly obliged to submit. Hencelt is that "anfference is the badge of all their tribe," and that over each engine-room affoat the well-known words of Dante in the "Inferno"-" All hope abandon, ye who enter here," might appositely be inscribed. Yet in spite of all dissabilities and disadvantages, and of the determination of naval officers to keep them in the roar, engineers sometimes came to the front and achieve giants' work a It was a Royal Naval Engineer who during the Abyssinian War constructed the railway for the Army, and arranged and managed all the traffic on it. He was highly commended for this service by Lord Napier, but the Admiralty, robably thinking he was "only an engineer," kent poor Fergusen out of his well earned promotion for four years. Apart, bowever, from exercing practical skill in his profession, the engineer has frequently faced an enemy and done nobleduty. In the war with China-of the policy of which the less said the better perhaps two engineers of the Navy, named respectively Leitch and Seriet, were the first to scale the walls of a besieged fortress, and they were volunteers for the work. Many similar instances might be enumerated, but it is unnecessary to adduce of promotion and retirement for the class in question was drawn up by a Committee compoted of Admirals and Inspectors of Machinery Affort. At this stage the subject was dropped apparently, for up to this hour" their Lordships " at Whitehall have done nothing towards the realization of the plan. Probably only engineers."-Echo.

A JEWISH OPINION OF "DANIEL

DERONDA." Dr. Hermann Adler, prescher of the Bayswa ter Synagogue, on the 9th December delivered a locture on "Daniel Deronda" to the Jewish Working-men's Club, Aldgate, Mr. H. Guedalla was in the chair. Dr. Adler said that the latest work of George Eliot contains the most faithful exposition of Judaiam and the Jewish character which has ever been published in this country by any one not an Israelite. A sad and bumiliating erect a telegraph line in Formosa, between the book could be written on the treatment of Jews principal coset towns of the island. It is also in literature, but against the calumnious misrepresentations, of which there were many old and by the Provincial Treasurer with the delicate recent examples, might be set the character of Rebessa in Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe, or The Honorary Treasurer of the Foothow the passage ain which the present Prime Minister want exaggeration, they only asked for justice and trath. Such a truthful description of several types of Jowish character they found in Daniel Deronda. Daniel Deronda himself seemed designed by the author to lay stress upon tile peculiarity of Judaism in that its professors are kindly granted the use of the old ground to the not bound together merely by the tie of a common religion, but that they have another tie almost as strong, that of common descent. Mordeont, an assistant in a second-hand book shop, a vender of watches, but a sort of Spinoza. a post and philosopher, interwhose mouth some of the finest reflections contained in the work were put reminded them of the fact that some of the most learned Jews, from the Rabbis of the Talmed down to Moses Mendelesohn, had been followers of handierafts or traders. This man had completely soized the lofty spiritual character We now understand that the Focohow branch of hisreligion and the great future in store for it. He did not think the purification of Judaism meant the throwing off of all its distinctive rites and observances. He looked forward to the Holy Land becoming an organic centre for the dews dispersed over the whole world-to's new Jawish polity like the old, a Republic with equality of protection, so that the outraged Jew might have a defence in the court of nations, as the outraged Englishen or American, an And when he had ceased the speech in which presed these aspirations to the members of the Philophers' Club, so solemn was the effect produced that no one ventured to resume the discussion. It was as though they had come to hear the blowing of the shofs, the trumpet which is sounded on the New Year and on the Day of Repentance. The author must have read very extensively on the subject of Jewish life and prayer, bu that would not wholly account for the fidelity of her descriptions. We must also ascribe it to that power of divination which made Schiller give the most vivid description of the Lake of Lancerne, though he had never visited Switzerland. Names and aliusious often bespeak her familiarity with ancient oustoms and little studied literature. . When Dr. Adler had read a few pages of the book and met with the name Kleumer, he said to himself, "The author of this book is deeply read in Jewish folk-lore. The name Klesmer, compounded of two Hebrew words was given to the musicians who used to play at Jewish weddings. No aptersurname could be adopted to denote the Hebrew extraotion of the clever Bohemian or Polish musician of the style of Rubinstein. There are passages in the book in which we may fancy that a Polish Magid is expounding a difficult Hageds. in miking marriages." Was not that nonsense or blanhemy? No: "the levity of the Baying lies in the ear of him who bears it. By marmaker our good and evil." Many theories had been started to explain how it was that George Eliot wrote the Jewish epinodes of her book. Dr. Adler was of opinion that she was induced to take her deep interest in Judaism by the fact that she, in common with every profound thinker, could not fail to become interested in a faith which, as she herself stated, has penetrated the thinking balf of the world and modided the forms of the world e religious. And the central figure of the great work thus inepired, a book which was certainly an English classic, was a person like themselves, a Jowish workingsman. The lecture was frequently interrupted by applause, and at the end a vote of
